The year-long plan was developed to allow lessons to build sequentially and cover PPS writing standards. The goal of these units is to provide teachers with resources to ensure that all K-5 students receive the instruction and writing opportunities needed to reach grade level expectations in writing, not to mandate a lock-step order for teachers to follow.

Writing Year Long Plan
Grades 3, 4 and 5

Please note that units of study (for example, Narrative Writing: Personal Narrative, Expository Writing: Informational Article, etc.) occur at similar times throughout the year in grades 3, 4 and 5. The 3-5 Writing Committee’s goal in doing this was to ensure maximum opportunities for intermediate grade teachers to collaborate, refine instruction and analyze student work based on the common characteristics of a specific genre or unit of study.

Introduction to Grade 5 Writing Units of Study

This notebook came about as a result of Portland Public Schools recognizing the need to support the teaching of writing throughout the district. A committee composed of intermediate teachers from throughout the district was formed to look at the unique needs of third, fourth and fifth grade writers. The group was asked to create year-long plans for writing instruction, along with units, lessons and teacher resources to accompany them. After identifying our underlying beliefs about the teaching of writing, the committee members agreed upon the following points to guide our work.

The Units of Study for Grades 3, 4 and 5 will:

- Be used as a guide or menu at each grade level
- Be aligned with district/state standards
- Provide articulation and alignment in writing instruction K-5
- Support both the novice and experienced intermediate teacher
- Be based on a writing workshop model and research-based practice

Teachers are encouraged to adapt, add, extend, or delete lessons, depending on their students’ needs. The three-ring binder allows teachers to easily add, repeat or rearrange lessons. Every lesson contains space for notes. We hope teachers will record their practice and ideas for revising, and for remembering adaptations, adjustments, read-aloud titles, etc., for the next time they teach the lessons. There are a wide variety of mentor texts recommended throughout the lessons and we hope you will use those that are familiar and easily available to you.

The lessons come from the collective knowledge and years of experience of all committee members. Some of the major resources/authors teachers rely on include:

- Columbia Teachers Summer Writing Institute
- Portland Writing Project/Oregon Writing Project
- Portland Public Schools – Common Assignment Units
- Lucy Calkins—Units of Study for Teaching Writing, Grades 3-5
- Ralph Fletcher and JoAnne Portalupi—Craft Lessons
- Lynne Dorfman and Rose Cappelli—Mentor Texts
- Denver Public Schools—Year-At-A-Glance (online)
- Linda Hoyt and Teresa Therriault – Mastering the Mechanics
Please forgive us if we borrowed an idea unintentionally without giving credit where credit is due.

We would like to thank the teachers on the PPS Kindergarten Writing Committee who began this process and those who will continue to revise and develop this document.

The Writing Cycle

Prewriting: Also referred to as rehearsal or brainstorming, this involves writing, talking, or thinking that is generative, open-ended, and meant to help a writer plan for the writing to come. Like all aspects of the writing cycle, this is a highly personalized process varying according to the writer and the specific task at hand.

Drafting: The writing produced early in the process when the focus is on content and meaning. It includes composing, revision, and editing. (You will teach the three steps in isolation initially, and then teach the students to use them simultaneously as they work through their piece. For example, if you stop and reread to make sure you got your point across, you may notice a misspelled word and correct it at that moment even though editing was not your intent.)

Revising is about making meaning. In this part of the writing cycle students reread and make meaning-based changes in an earlier draft in order to clarify, develop, or sharpen their writing.

Editing: the process of rereading to correct spelling, punctuation and grammar

Publishing: The point where a piece of writing gets presented to an audience other than the writer. Most things do not get published and things that do get published are published in a variety of ways. The important part is that all students get a chance to publish.

Adapted from Writing Workshop: The Essential Guide by Ralph Fletcher and JoAnn Portalupi. glossary.

It is important for all students to know how to access each part of the writing cycle as a tool, but it is unrealistic that all writers will progress through the cycle in the same order and at the same time.

Writing Workshop

DESCRIPTION:
Writing Workshop supports the PPS Literacy Framework utilizing modeling, guided practice, and independent practice. Teachers use writing lessons with whole and small groups to explicitly demonstrate and teach the organization, strategies, skills and craft of writing. Teachers provide blocks of time for students to practice the concepts during independent writing.

OUTCOME:
Students will apply the strategies, skills and craft lessons learned from writing lessons to their own writing.

ASSESSMENT:
In order to assess student writing, a variety of tools need to be used:

- Lesson specific rubrics serve to focus classroom instruction and inform students of writing expectations for specific assignments.
- State Writing Scoring Guide is used to monitor students progress toward meeting grade level expectations in writing and to provide end-of-year outcome data.
- End of Unit and End of Year Reflections provide students with the opportunity to self-assess and set future goals.
- Baseline writing sample allows teachers to assess student writing strengths and weaknesses and plan instruction accordingly.

LOOK FORS:

Teachers:

- Teacher uses Mentor Texts and Student and Teacher Model Texts to demonstrate effective writing craft.
- Teacher uses "Think Alouds" when modeling all aspects of writing instruction.
- Teacher models, or writes in front of students, demonstrating the specific instructional focus (e.g., use of transitional phrases, descriptive words, introductions, leads and topic sentences, use of dialogue, etc.).
- Teacher provides opportunities for guided practice/active engagement and independent practice.
- Teacher provides many opportunities for short writes.
- Teacher has individual and small group writing conferences with students.
- Teacher provides additional small group writing instruction when needed.
- Teacher provides a variety of strategies for students to share work.
- Teacher provides instruction in the use of Revision and Editing Checklists and they are used regularly during Writing Workshop.
• Teacher uses a wide variety of Anchor Charts to reinforce the skills and craft of writing.
• Teacher posts published student work and related instructional anchor charts

Students:
• Students apply content from writing lessons to independent writing (e.g., use editing checklists, reference classroom anchor charts, etc.)
• Students refer to dictionaries, thesauruses and other resources to check spelling
• Students write on self-selected topics as well as teacher directed topics
• Students are writing productively for sustained periods of time
• Students are in various stages of the writing process
• Students help one another with their writing
• Students share various aspects of their writing

Teaching kids how to write is hard. That’s because writing is not so much one skill as a bundle of skills that includes sequencing, spelling, rereading, and supporting big ideas with examples. But these skills are teachable. And we believe that a writing workshop creates an environment where students can acquire these skills, along with the fluency, confidence, and desire to see themselves as writers.

Quote from Writing Workshop: The Essential Guide by Ralph Fletcher and JoAnn Portalupi, p. 1

The most essential features of good writing – such as "word choice," or "voice" and their sub-elements -can be mastered only through repeated exposure to very focused lessons and practice opportunities that include the use of modeling and exemplars. The dramatic writing-improvement stores I have learned of and written about were a result of lessons that included continuous explanation, examples, practice, and feedback.

Quote from Results Now, by Mike Schmoker, pg
Writing Lessons

Writing lessons are short, focused and explicit. The goal of daily writing lessons is to teach a specific writing skill, craft or strategy, through modeling and guided practice. This skill or strategy will then be practiced by students during independent writing, student-teacher conferences, student sharing and if needed, additional small group writing instruction.

While the pie chart above allots about 15 minutes for the writing lesson, teachers will find that this varies from lesson to lesson. In addition, this is by no means the only instructional opportunity in the writer’s workshop. Instructional opportunities continue while students are writing. Teachers rove around the room supporting writers as they do the important work of writing. Teachers can point out strong writing they see from students or highlight good decisions students make as they move through the writing process. This roving time is also a chance to gently remind writers about key skills and strategies they are working on. All of the short reminders and celebrations that teachers offer to individuals are part of the intricate web of support writers receive in the workshop.

The sharing and closure are also opportunities for instruction. Strong examples of writing can be highlighted, key teaching points revisited and community built between writers as they share. The sharing time can also be used to model for students the important problem solving thinking that writers do as they figure out how to write through the hard parts.

The writing lessons included in these units of study generally fall into four categories.

Four categories of writing lessons

• Procedural: important information about how writing workshop operates. These include how to get and use materials, what to do when you’re done, use of a writing notebook, peer sharing, etc.

• Writer’s process: a series of steps, often overlapping, that all writers use when producing a final version of their writing o choose, explore or organize a topic
  o write drafts
  o revise writing
  o publish and bring their writing to a final form

• Qualities of good writing: information that deepens students’ understandings of literary techniques: for example, writing engaging leads and effective endings, effectively organizing thoughts and ideas, etc.
• Editing skills: apply knowledge of spelling, punctuation and grammar to writing

(Adapted from Writing Workshop: The Essential Guide by Ralph Fletcher and JoAnn Portalupi. Scaffolding Young Writers by Linda Dorn and Carla Sofos

Teachers are encouraged to develop additional writing lessons to meet the needs of their students. The following section of may be helpful in designing further lessons.

Possible Topics for Writing Lessons

Procedural: important information about how writing workshop operates. These include how to get and use materials, what to do when you're done, peer sharing, and so on. Repeat procedural lessons whenever needed to remind students of expectations and routines.

- What is writing workshop?
- What are the writing materials?
- How to locate writing materials: paper, pencils, erasers, etc.
- How to self-manage writing materials
- Advantages of a quiet space
- How to self-manage your writing behaviors
- How to use classroom resources
- How to set-up writing folder/notebook
- How to help yourself when no one is available to help you
- What to do when you think you're done
- What to expect and how to prepare for a teacher conference
- How to share your writing with the class
- Asking questions of an author and giving compliments
- How to use writing checklists
- Using highlighters as editing tools

Writing Process: a series of steps, often overlapping, that all writers use when producing a final version of their writing

- Exploring different purposes for writing
- Writing for different audiences
- Choosing a topic
- What writers write about
- Brainstorming ideas by using webs, T-charts, lists, conversation, etc.
• Adding more information relevant to the topic
• Revision and editing routines
• How to revise your message for clarity of meaning
• How to stick to a topic (i.e. how to eliminate redundant and unnecessary information)
• How to organize information for writing
• How to organize paragraphs
• How to reread your writing
• Preparing work for publication

Qualities of Good Writing/Craft: information to deepen students’ understandings of literary techniques: leads, endings, scene, point of view, transitions, and so on. These topics are also referred to as “author’s craft.”

• Choosing amazing vocabulary (Tier 2 words from interactive read alouds)
• Using rich and descriptive words
• How to attend to small details
• How to create mind pictures
• How to choose specific words for communicating the best message (expensive words)
• How to create strong lead sentences or paragraphs o Shocker for beginning
  o Question
  o Sound word
  o Foreboding lead (you know something bad is going to happen
  o “Jump right in” lead
• How to use figurative language (similes, metaphors, personification, exaggeration)
• How to use sound devices (alliteration, onomatopoeia, rhythm)
• How to develop rich descriptions of characters
• How to create descriptive settings
• How to use strong action verbs
• How to create catchy endings (satisfying wrap-up)
  o Summary statement
  o From That Day Forward
  o Question
• Problem/resolution
• Transitions
  o Time order (next, second, last, finally)
• Passage of time (three days later, after supper, sometimes, usually, actually)
• Meaning (because, suddenly, soon, however, likewise, so)
• Change of place (down the street, next door)
• Voice—how to make it sound like you (point of view, visual devices)
• Sentence Fluency
  o Varied types (declarative, interrogative, imperative)
  o Varied structure (simple, compound, complex)
  o Varied lengths
  o Varied beginnings
• Using examples of published literature to springboard ideas
• Dialogue/Blocking

Editing Skills: See Convention Tab

Writing Lesson Format

The writing lessons in these resources use the following format:

• Writing Teaching Point(s): Teaching point(s) for each lesson
• Standard(s): Writing Standard(s) are referenced for each lesson
• Connection: Connects new learning to previous learning/lessons
• Modeling: Uses ‘think alouds’ when modeling what you expect students to do
• Guided Practice/Active Engagement: Guides students through practice of the teaching point
• Link to Independent Practice: Helps writers understand the purpose for the writing they are about to do and the skills/craft they will be practicing/applying independently as good writers
• Independent Writing/Student Conferences: Provides time for students to do independent writing while teacher confers with individual students or works with small groups
• Closure/Sharing: Pull students back together and recognize the work they have done relating to the teaching point

Writing Lesson Template

Writing Teaching Point(s):

Standard(s):

Materials:

Connection: (1-3 minutes) Putting today’s writing lesson into the context of the class’s ongoing work. Yesterday we worked on . . . You remember how . . . The connection ends by telling students what will be explicitly taught today. Today I will show/teach you how . . .

Teach (modeling): Explicit language to teach students a new strategy or concept. Model what you expect students to do.

Active Engagement (guided practice): After teaching something, students are given the opportunity to try the new skill or strategy. Sometimes this is a “turn and talk” about what they’ve just seen demonstrated. Guide students through practice of the teaching point.

Link to Independent Practice: Help writers discover the purpose for the writing they are about to do so they are prepared to get to work. This practice, activity or strategy will not only improve the writing, but empower the writer.

Closure: Pull students back together and recognize the work they have done relating to the teaching point. The closing/share reinforces the writing lesson skill or strategy.

Notes: Teachers are encouraged to adapt, add, or extend lessons depending on their students’ needs. We hope teachers will record their practice and ideas for revising, and for remembering adaptations, adjustments, read-aloud titles, etc., for the next time they teach the lesson.

Resources & References (acknowledgements): List of resources and references used to create lesson.
Conferences

When you conference with a student, focus on content and craft first (before conventions). Give two praises and then one push. Help student evaluate progress toward the goal and, if the goal has been reached, set a new goal. Recording your conferences may be helpful. (See sample record sheet in Resources.) Try to conference with three to five students per day. Ideally you will conference with every student each week. Remember, if multiple students are working on the same skill, you can pull several students for a small group conference.

The trickiest part of conferencing is the management. Lucy Calkins has a great list of tips. Details on p. 41 of The Nuts and Bolts of Teaching Writing. The main points include:

- Keep moving so conferences can be short and frequent.
- Teach students never to interrupt when you are conferring.
- Occasionally, share with the whole class the teaching in one conference.
- Create systems of dealing with daily occurrences that don’t require your intervention.
- Teach students how to solve predictable problems on their own.
- Create a place where students who need a conference can go for your help.
- Concentrate on teaching the target goals of the lesson/unit, not on making every student’s piece the best it can be.
- Create the expectation of a lot of writing work getting done each workshop time.
- Use small groups when many students need the same conference.

Here are some questions to ask about conferences:

Where should I conduct my conferences?
- Teacher goes to the student(s)
- Should be enough room for teacher/students to move around
- Encourage students to eavesdrop

What tools do I need to help me confer?
- Conference records
- mentor text
- post-its (sometimes you can leave a written message for students)

What do students need?
- their work-in-progress
- supply basket
- maybe a mentor text
Sharing

There is a wide variety of ways to share, and it doesn’t always have to be at the end.

- Pair share: Students are directed to share a certain part of their writing i.e., only the part that reflects the writing lesson focus; a favorite sentence; or read their entire piece, with a partner.

- Think-Pair-Share: Think-pair-share allows students to share and reflect on their ideas or answers with a partner before sharing with the large group. A question is posed and students are given a few minutes to think independently about their responses. Students then partner with a peer and discuss responses or ideas to the question or problem posed.

- Turn and Talk: During a lesson, there may be opportunities to have the students do a turn and talk activity for a few minutes. This allows students to talk about the information presented or shared and to clarify thoughts or questions. This is an effective alternate strategy to asking questions to the whole group and having only a few students respond. All students have a chance to talk in a non-threatening situation for a short period of time.

- Small groups (e.g., table groups): students take turns sharing at table groups.

- Pop-up share: students pop-up from their seats and quickly share the way they used the writing lesson, i.e., “pop-up share today will be your interesting lead.” Everyone who wants a turn gets to share.

- Zip Around: Each student briefly shares a small, targeted piece of their writing that reinforces the writing lesson. For example, after revising for verb, have each student share a verb they changed.

- Teacher-selected share (you may share one or more samples you noticed during conferences that are solid examples of the teaching point. Or you may want to ask a few students who have done work that illustrates your point to stand up and share (or show work on the ELMO).

- Author’s chair: a designated place in the classroom where the writer sits when sharing with the class. Sharing from the Author’s Chair usually signified a particular form of response (e.g., help for work in progress, celebrator comments for finished work). Writing Workshop: The Essential Guide by Ralph Fletcher and JoAnn Portalupi.

- Other methods you discover as you experiment and share

Regardless of format, sharing has certain characteristics:

- Predictable structure
- Provides another time to teach
- Provides opportunity to use Anchor Charts and reinforce skill or concept
- Demonstrates what was taught in the writing lesson
- Many voices should be heard (sharing is NOT about one student)
• Sharing can be an opportunity to share what is working as well as to get advice about where they are ‘stuck’
• Great time to make someone “famous” (Andrea Schmidt)
Classroom Tools and Strategies for Effective Writing Instruction

The 3-5 Writing Committee identified key instructional writing tools and strategies to include throughout lessons in all units of study. These tools and strategies have proven effective in helping students learn the complex set of skills needed to reach grade level standards in writing.

These tools and strategies include:
- Anchor Charts
- Characteristics of Genre
- Mentor Texts
- Teacher and Student Model Texts
- Short Writes
- Small Group Conferences
- Writing Notebooks
- Unit Reflections

A description of each of these follows:

Anchor Charts

One of the most important components of a good writing workshop is sharing. Writers need an audience for their ideas and words. Writers also need to know how different writers approach different assignments, craft elements and genre. Sharing need not be limited to author’s chair nor should it be limited to the sharing of completed whole pieces of writing. One way to bring sharing into your writing workshop is with the use of anchor charts.

Anchor charts are posters or chart paper dedicated to a specific writing craft or skill that students are learning about. For example, when doing a narrative unit you might make an anchor chart for setting description. When doing an expository unit you might start an anchor chart for strong thesis statements. As students successfully attempt the craft element or skill being taught, they add an example from their writing to the anchor chart. Teachers continually refer to these charts to reinforce the learning of new skills and techniques.

Anchor charts allow many applications of the same lesson to be highlighted in the classroom. They also make it easier for more reluctant sharers to have their writing included in the community of ideas. Students do not need to verbally read their excerpt; they can simply write it on the chart. Students do not need to volunteer to share; the teacher can invite them to add to the chart while circulating as students write. Students do not need to succeed with an entire finished piece in order to join the public conversation around writing; they need only do well with one piece of the elaborate puzzle in order to be included.

Here is a list of ways teachers have used anchor charts with success in various writing workshops.

Focus on a Craft Lesson

When teaching a lesson on a specific craft of writing like setting description for narratives or strong introductions for expository, an anchor chart can act to reinforce the skill that has been taught. Include making an anchor chart in your plan for the day’s lesson. As you lead students through the writing lesson, start a chart with the craft element listed as the title of the chart. If the lesson includes a model, write the relevant excerpt on the chart as well. You should prep this before the lesson begins so you don’t waste valuable writing time by transcribing in front of the class.

Let students know that as they write today you will be looking for examples of how they are applying the craft element to their writing. As you circulate, invite students who are using the craft element with some success to add their example to the chart. It is helpful to carry a highlighter or packet of small post-it notes to identify the section you want a student to add.

Close the lesson by reading the chart and asking if anyone you missed wants to add an example.

Reading Like Writers

Craft lessons are an important part of the writing workshop. “Reading Like A Writer’ provides students with an opportunity to recognize a craft strategy used in a model or mentor text. Students then decide if this strategy could be used to enhance their own writing.

Display and read a model of writing. Invite students to share what they have noticed and what they liked in the writing. Name the strategy. If you know the appropriate literary term, use it. If not, name the strategy as something that makes sense to you. Studnets then reread their own writing, looking for places to use the strategy from the model.

You may choose to begin an anchor chart, i.e., ‘Craft Strategies Authors Use’. The chart might include three sections: Name of Craft, Mentor Sample, and Our Classroom Examples. Add student examples to the chart. Read and discuss the examples sharing how the strategy strengthened the writing.
Powerful Language Leads to Powerful Writing

When writers are first drafting a new piece of writing, they need to devote their attention to the message, the story or the point of their piece. Once they have a sense of the piece, writers are ready to start tinkering with the small pieces making up the big picture. Looking at the words they are using is a great way to do this.

Anchor charts can be used to highlight powerful language in student’s writing. If you are presenting a craft lesson on using powerful verbs, start an anchor chart for powerful verbs. If you are leading a lesson on topic specific vocabulary for an expository piece, start an anchor chart for this vocabulary. You can even create an anchor chart for great words the writers in your class are learning and applying.

These anchor charts can be added to over several days or the entire unit of study.

Punctuation Prowess

Punctuation is about more than accuracy. The ways writers punctuate writing determines how their pieces are read, experienced and understood. When a new punctuation mark is introduced, create an anchor chart for it. As writers begin applying this punctuation, they add their examples to the chart.

See A Fresh Approach to Teaching Punctuation by Janet Angelillo and Mechanically Inclined by Jeff Anderson for more ideas on how to use anchor charts to reinforce conventions.

Unit Reflection

Anchor charts offer a collective reflection opportunity to close a unit of writing. As you finish a unit, pose this question to your class: What makes good ____________ writing? Have students work in small groups or as a whole class to generate a list of what they know about the type of writing you have been working with. For each of the significant elements of the genre you have been working with, start an anchor chart.

Next have students review their drafts from that unit. They should look for examples in their own work of the elements of that genre. Once students find a few examples, they add them to the corresponding anchor chart.

This also offers good unit assessment to the teacher. Notice which charts fill up first and which have only a few or no examples. This will help you know what needs re-teaching and what has been understood.
Now that you have all this great environmental print around your room, what will you do with all that paper? Wall space is prime real estate in most classrooms. There is no way you can display all the anchor charts. It might not even be possible for you to display all the charts from a single unit. It is most important to find a spot to have at least one chart up for several days. Have it be the same spot in your classroom so your writers know to look there for help if they get stuck or if they were absent.

Retiring the charts from a given unit offers another opportunity for metacognition and reflection. Have students review all the anchor charts from the unit you are finishing. Dedicate a day of writing workshop to reviewing the posters. Students transfer the information they think is most relevant to their own writing notebook/tool-box for that genre. Then the charts are retired, making room for new ones dedicated to the next unit.

Other Anchor Chart Ideas

Notes
Characteristics of Writing Genre

The lessons in this writing resource binder are organized by units of study - Personal Narrative, Informational Article, Research Report Writing, Imaginative and Literacy Analysis. These units of study or genre, fall under two broad categories of writing: Narrative and Expository.

Narrative writing units and lessons focus on ways to recount an event or tell a story. Expository units and lessons focus on conveying factual information. Although there are commonalities among all types of writing, each broad category and each genre has unique characteristics. Teaching students to recognize and use these unique characteristics helps them write with greater clarity and purpose.

Below are tables listing characteristics or elements of each genre included in this resource binder. Please familiarize yourself with this table to assist you in the planning and teaching of the lessons in each unit. Please note, not all of these characteristics are taught at each grade level.

Mentor Texts

Mentor texts are inspiring pieces of literature that are reread with the eyes of a writer. Mentor texts show students how to write well. Using a mentor text, teachers guide students to study and imitate the skills and strategies of an author’s work.

Many lessons in the resource binder use a mentor text. Please note, these titles are suggestions only. There is a wealth of great narrative and realistic fiction models available to use in your classroom. If you choose to use your own models, keep the following guidelines in mind.
- Models should be short or identify an excerpt that teaches the writing elements you are focused on. While reading and writing are reciprocal processes, these are not reading lessons. The point is to use other writers as mentors for students’ own writing.
- Use familiar texts. Students can imitate writing strategies better when they already know the story.
- Offer students multicultural examples of narratives.

Teacher and Student Model Texts

Model texts are pieces of writing, done by either teachers or students, that demonstrate the targeted skills or strategies of the writing lesson. Many teacher model texts are included as part of the lessons in the resource binder. Teachers are encouraged to write their own and to use student models as well.

Short Writes

A Short Write is a brief piece of writing that is one strategy of the prewriting process. It is a result of responding to a prompt or something that sparks an idea. The purpose of the Short Write is to begin expressing ideas and words on paper.

Small Group Conferences

The Small Group Conference is one instructional approach during the conferring portion of the writing workshop. At times, conferring may include partners or small groups of three or four students who have similar instructional needs. Some examples of group conferences are:
- Table conferences – heterogeneous group; a review or reminder conference
- Skill conferences – all members have a specific skill strength or need
- Progress conferences – checking with a specific group to promote accountability
- Expectation conferences – teaching groups to manage materials and self-monitor
Writing Notebooks

There are many ways to organize a writing notebook. The specific type of notebook you use matters less than that you have a type of notebook that makes sense for you and your students. The number of sections or tabs you use matters less than that you show students how to use a consistent and manageable organizational routine. Where you put handouts and resources matters less than that students have a place to save the resources and ideas they get during the writer’s workshop.

Some teachers swear by composition books and have developed fantastic and elaborate systems for using them. Others can’t imagine teaching without three-ring binders. Some want to keep things simple and use good ol’ spirals. This section of the introduction was developed to give you some guidance and suggestions as you decide what type of notebook you will use and how you plan to organize the notebook to best support your students.

Deciding What Type of Notebook To Use

As you decide the type of notebook you will use in your writing workshop, ask yourself these questions:

- What types of notebooks have worked well for me and my students in the past?
- What have been some problems with the notebooks I have tried before?
- What kind of notebook can I easily transport from my classroom to staff and team meetings or between home and school?
- How do I want students to keep track of handouts and reference charts?
- How will students personalize the notebooks?
- Do I want students to be able to add or remove pages?
- Where will I store the notebooks in my room?
- What other notebooks are students using in other content areas? How can I help them keep each one separate?
- How does the grade ahead of mine and the grade below organize writing notebooks? What routines might we share?

Notebooks are an Important Writer’s Tool

When you read “writing notebook” anywhere in this writing resource binder it is referring to an organized, dedicated spot for writers to keep ideas, resources and drafts. Each unit in this binder refers to the writing notebook and includes aspects of writing lessons that rely on an organized notebook. It is not necessary to use an identical organizational system to the ones mentioned in the lessons. It is important to have a system.
Dividing the Notebook to Support Writing

There are various sections of the notebook that have been helpful to teachers in supporting their writers. The most important three are:

• Ideas Section
• Resources/Toolbox Section
• Drafting

These sections are described in detail below.

Ideas Section:

Writers collect ideas. The lessons in this writing resource binder invite students to continuously gather lists, sketches, graphic organizers, webs and many other brainstorming techniques for generating possible writing topics. Students won’t develop all of these ideas into final drafts or even rough ones. The thinking work that goes into generating these possible writing topics is an important aspect of the writing workshop. Assigning a discreet section of the notebook for this important work hints at its significance. In addition, the collection of ideas serve to combat writer’s block throughout the year. The more writing possibilities students have, the more likely they are to connect to an idea that they can develop into a full piece of writing.

Resources/Toolbox Section:

Writing is about much more than a good seed idea. Writing well is about using the tools of writing: engaging and unique language, a clear organizational structure, the conventions of print, developing ideas through detail, figurative language and evidence to name a few. These are the types of lessons you will find in this writing resource binder. The resources/toolbox section is devoted to preserving these important lessons so students can refer to them over and over again. This list represents some of the things that might be added to the resources/toolbox section.

High-Frequency word lists
Personal spelling list
Notes on the rules for punctuating dialogue
Notes on the routine for developing sentence fluency
Handout with examples of strong narrative leads
Lists of ways to make paragraphing decisions
Examples of various uses of the comma
Revision and editing checklists
Drafting:
The drafting section is reserved for just that. Students start all of their writing in this section. Many of the units in this writing resource binder have students start a series of pieces of writing, often referred to as short writes, but only finish one or two. These short writes are started here. Longer drafts are developed here as well.

Within the drafting section, people have developed a variety of ways to structure the writing so students can do revision and editing.

1. Have students write drafts only on the right hand side or front of each page in the notebook. The left hand side is reserved for revisions, spelling word lists, feedback from peers and teachers, and notes on specific conventions or craft lessons.

2. Have students write on every other line of their notebook. The blank line is reserved for revisions and edits.

3. Have students skip a few pages after each short write. If they choose to return to that short write and develop it into a finished piece, they have enough space to do so.
Other Sections That Teachers Like To Include

Table of Contents and Page Numbers: Students list each assignment and various drafts. Students also go through and number each page of the notebook.

Conventions Practice Section: Students only remember the conventions lessons they actually practice and use. This section is the first step in having students apply a lesson on the conventions of print.

Handouts Section: Students put handouts into binders or glue them into notebooks. If using composition books, format your handouts with smaller margins. Then students can cut and paste the actual handout right into their notebooks.

Writer’s Daybook Section: Some teachers encourage students to live the writerly life- gathering ideas and language wherever they find it. This section is devoted to jotting down ideas, quotes from books, lines from songs, found objects and anything else that adds to the writer’s universe of knowledge about writing.

Final Draft Section: Since students are taking only some of their drafts through the writing process to final draft, some teachers prefer to have a final draft section of the notebook.

Reflection/Goal Setting Section: Each unit ends with a reflection lesson. Keeping these inside the notebooks is helpful to some teachers.

Logistics

Teachers use a variety of ways to separate sections of the notebooks. Some teachers use tabs in a three-ring binder, others use attachable flags in a composition book or spiral, and still others work from the front of the notebook on drafts and from the back of the notebook for recording resources and conventions ideas. (See Aimee Buckner’s Notebook Know-How for more detail on this strategy.)

Remember not to get bogged down with tabs, sections and notebooks design. The purpose of the notebook is to support writers. Design it to be useful and efficient. Don’t plan for more systems than you can reasonably manage. As long as students have a consistent place they are writing and storing their writing, they can engage with writing workshop.

The following professional books were used in developing this resource:
- Notebook Know-How by Aimee Buckner
- Scaffolding Young Writers By Linda Dorn and Carla Soffos
- Study Driven by Katie Wood Ray
- After the End by Barry Lane
- Guiding Readers and Writers in Grades 3-6 by Fountas and Pinnell
Unit Reflection Options

This notebook of writing lessons is organized into genre specific units of study. One of the benefits of this type of yearlong plan is that it allows students to be immersed in a genre long enough to develop understanding. It allows students to make decisions about which pieces they will take through to final drafts and which they will leave as rough drafts. Students’ reflection on their own learning is the capstone of each unit. The units are designed to include one or two days of student reflection in the final lessons. Below is a list of ways you might teach students to reflect:

Unit Reflection Anchor Charts

Anchor charts offer a collective reflection opportunity to close a unit of writing. As you finish a unit, pose this question to your class: What makes good ________ writing? Have students work in small groups or as a whole class to generate a list of what they know about the type of writing studied. For each of the significant elements of the genre start an anchor chart.

Next, have students review all their drafts from that unit. They should look for examples in their own work of the elements of that genre. Once students find a few examples, they add them to the corresponding anchor chart. Examples do not have to come from the final draft pieces. Sometimes wonderful gems of writing are found in rough drafts.

This routine also offers good unit assessment to the teacher. Notice which charts fill up first and which have only a few or no examples. This will help you know what needs re-teaching and what has been understood.

Portfolio Selection Notes

Students will be selecting one or two drafts from each unit to take through the entire writing process. This final draft will be stored in a portfolio of student writing. Before students place a piece of writing in their portfolio, have them reflect on the decisions they made in choosing the piece(s). These portfolio selection notes are added along with the piece(s) of writing to the portfolio.

Pick three or four relevant questions for students to explore in their notes.

Why did you choose this piece?
What does it show about you as a writer?
What does it show you know about ________ writing?
What is your favorite part of this piece?
What revisions did you make? How did they make the writing better?
What was difficult for you in writing this piece? How did you write through the hard parts:
Criteria Posters

These are similar to the anchor charts. Students work in small groups to make posters of the criteria for the genre they have just studied. A criteria poster for a persuasive unit might include:
- A strong introduction
- Belief statement
- Strong evidence
- Transition words
- Conclusion and counterpoint

Once the group is confident they have all the criteria, they work to find examples in their own and each other’s writing. Students do a gallery walk or some type of sharing of the posters.

Note: To ensure all students ideas are included on each poster, give each member of the group a different color of pen to use. You should see each color on the finished poster.

Reflection Letters

Reflection letters are an extension of the Criteria Posters. Students list two or three elements they have successfully used in their own writing. For each, students should give one example from their writing. i.e., lead using a question, “How would I ever get myself out of this mess?”

Once students have listed the examples, they write a letter to the teacher explaining what they have learned in this unit of study.

Reflection letters are a great way to wrap up the year’s writing. An example follows this section.

Advice Column

Students may use the same format as the Reflection Letter to write an advice column or letter to next year’s class.

Other Reflection Ideas
Offer some variety in the ways you invite students to reflect on their writing. Reflection is hard work and having fresh ways of doing it helps students engage in this important work. Do one of the group activities, like anchor charts or criteria posters, early in the year. Move towards reflection letters by the end of the year.

What did you enjoy about this writing unit?

What did you not like?
May 28, 2004

Dear Ms. J,

The subject I really enjoy is writing. I love to write. Your lessons make me want to be a writer when I grow up.

Let me tell you about the things I learned. First, figurative language. I told my sister that when you move into a higher grade you have to use figurative language. Let me give you an example. In my scar story I wrote, “It felt like burning lava on my cheek.” That made the pain seem real.

Now I will move on to main ideas. It was so hard when I started my child labor essay. But I figured it out. Here is one main idea from my essay, “Child labor should be abolished because kids have to do dangerous jobs.” The rest of that paragraph told about dangerous jobs.

Last year I already knew how to persuade but I learned even more this year. This one is my best, “I hope this will persuade you to have child labor abolished.”

Now, let me tell you about my favorite writing subject: poems. My favorite poem I wrote was My Hair is Long. I like that one because I got started right away. That is because this poem uses figurative language. If you don’t understand what I am talking about, here is an example. “My arms are like the branches of a sycamore.” I got my ideas right away when we started writing this poem.

Another quality of writing that I use is Show, Don’t Tell. When I shared my boat story with the class, I wondered what was good. Then you told me it was Show, Don’t Tell. I didn’t just tell you my family was getting ready, I showed all the things we were doing.

All these qualities of writing are in my writing from this year. Thanks!

From the person who wrote this,
Christy.
Launching Your Writing Workshop

Setting routines and providing tools students are able to access and use independently are vital to orchestrating a successful writing workshop. Students must know what to expect and what is expected of them.

Teachers make the writing workshop look so easy. In some ways, it is. Every day, the same routines. Every day, the same materials in the same place. Every day, the teachers set aside big blocks of time. Every day, the students are eager to participate. Every day, the teacher coaches, nudges, supports, smiles, celebrates, and extends the students’s work. Every day, the students groan when it is time to stop. (Shelley Harwayne, p. 159)

It is extremely important for you to decide what you want in your own classroom.

- What do you value?
- What level of talk do you want in your classroom?
- Where are students allowed to work?
- What does a partner share look like?
- Where are supplies kept and which ones are students allowed to access?
- What do students do when teacher is busy?
- What writing resources will you have available in classroom?
- What will writing notebooks or folders look like and how will student work be stored?
Portfolios

When portfolios are referred to in this writing resource binder they are seen as part of each individual students’ writing process.

At the end of each unit you will find a lesson inviting students to reflect on what they learned about writing and about themselves as writers. These reflection pieces along with the final drafts are great portfolio submissions. They act as a capstone to the unit and the learning students have done.

Portfolios need not be a museum of polished drafts. They can also serve to preserve student growth as writers throughout their process.

• Short writes can be included if the student learned something important about writing from that short write.
• Notes from conventions lessons can be added to the portfolio if a student decides that convention is an important one to remember and use.
• Students can browse through all the drafts, lists, notes etc. that they made as part of a writing unit and select two or three pieces that show what they learned or even what remains a mystery to them.

The important thing to remember is that students need time to reflect on their learning and they need time to select a few artifacts of their learning. Portfolios are a great way to do this.

Simple portfolio design:

• A file crate or drawer
• Place a file with each students name in the crate.
• Near the end of each unit devote one session of Writing Workshop to giving students time to identify two or three pieces they want to add to their portfolio.
• Once each term or grading period have students go back to their portfolios, to review their submissions/work.
• Students can even write a letter about what they have learned.

For more on portfolio ideas see the Unit Reflection section of the Introduction.
Meeting the Needs of All Students

Writing Workshop supports best practices for all students because it utilizes a gradual release model. In a gradual release model the teacher models (I do), then provides guided practice (we do) and finally provides opportunity for independent practice (you do). In order to best meet the needs of our diverse learners, the lessons include the following best practices:

- Turn and Talk allows process time for all students and gives peer support in articulating ideas in English.
- ELD Sentence Frames for turn and talks support language development.
- Active Engagement gives students an opportunity to participate and practice the skill being presented.
- Mentor Texts include visuals and examples students can refer to during independent practice.
- End-of-Unit Project: Whole-group pre-writing is embedded in the end-of-unit project. All students have access to the ideas generated collectively. This is the teacher’s chance to informally assess who is working independently and who needs help. There are opportunities for reteaching through the final project as well as to gather information to help you plan appropriate minilessons for the next unit.
- Conferencing includes opportunities for individual and small group assistance.
- Sharing provides opportunities for students to speak and listen to each other and practice language skills. Through sharing they get ideas from peers and build community.

Sentence Frames

To increase the level of support for ELD sentence frames, sentences can be written on sentence strips and posted when you call for sharing. Sentences can be explicitly read, following along with your finger and filling in the blanks with a few examples. All students can echo with you so that ELL students get a few practices before trying on their own. Make sure you do a gradual release of responsibility. You can scaffold the blanks within the framed ELD sentences depending on the level of your English learners. Don’t overload the students by teaching them another mini lesson on prepositional phrases at this particular time, but give them a few of the basic options to pick from. For example:

“The story took place ____________.”

in Portland / in the classroom at school / at the park / at home
by the lake / by the pool / by the monkey bars
As teachers, we want to remember students have not had many opportunities to hear and practice correct English structure. Imagine yourself learning a foreign language—think of basic framed sentences that would allow you to offer your opinion and be part of a conversation. (Not all ELL students will be ready to read. It is important that they hear the pattern several times. Remember they need to speak, speak, speak and use full grammatically correct sentences. Students using the contrived frames will naturally move on to creating varied sentences as they become more fluent in English.) If you have ESL support in your building, use them as a resource. They have access to vocabulary posters, picture dictionaries, and/or could help you build them.

Word Lists and Other Supports
To further support ELL learners and other students with special needs, you may want to help them make many lists of words associated with their writing topic: lists of nouns, verbs, adjectives, and prepositional phrases when applicable. Add quick sketches with the words when possible. This can be done in a small group conference or a writing lesson depending on the number of students needing the support. You can use these lists for all of your students and challenge the higher level English speakers to use synonyms, more vigorous verbs, or just be more specific. You can also track student growth by checking personal word lists before you help them add to them. These lists can become mini topic dictionaries for them to refer back to when writing. As teachers, we need to remember that the learners might already understand or have heard a lot of the vocabulary but are not accessing and/or using it spontaneously yet.

Any students needing support in transcription (phonics) can be gathered in a small and supported in getting started. This is also a time to offer additional supports such as alphabet strips, word banks, labeled pictures, graphic organizers. Check back with this group frequently as you move around conferencing with other students.

Graphic organizers can support students in being independent. A graphic organizer or scaffolded paper for a specific project can assist students in getting started. It is important to determine which type of graphic organizer will support specific students depending on whether they need a web to brainstorm, or something linear to help them organize their thoughts, or something showing specific steps in order.

Because Writing Workshop is not silent, you may need to help students choose a workspace that provides less distraction. Sometimes headphones will cut the sound level enough to help a student focus. Study carrels can help students who are distracted by motion.
Practice
Students need the freedom to try out the strategies presented in writing lessons and to start and stop and move between projects. There is not an expectation that everything started will be finished. All students will take the end-of-unit project to publication. In the meantime, it is important for students to realize that writers sometimes start a piece of writing that they decide not to finish or to set aside for a period of time. When writers feel passionate about something, it’s appropriate to take the time to write about it now rather than going back to something from a previous day. By the same token, writers may spend several days on a longer project. Allow students to express their creativity by taking on large projects, but also guide them in narrowing the project or letting it go when they lose interest.

Writing Workshop Teacher Resource Booklist
(This list is by no means all-inclusive. It represents a broad range of Writing Workshop resources.)

Alley, Marybeth and Barbara Orehovec. Revisiting the Writing Workshop: Management, Assessment, and Mini-Lessons.
Basic, easy to adapt and follow. Has information on getting started including 20 minilessons to build a strong writing workshop. Heavy focus on mentor texts and studying author craft.

Calkins, Lucy. Units of Study for Primary Writing: A Yearlong Curriculum.
A complete set of units written in 9 books including The Nuts and Bolts of Teaching Writing and The Conferring Handbook as well seven units of study. (Many PPS schools have a least one set at school.)

Detailed information on using mentor texts to teach author’s craft. Extensive list of suggested mentor texts for craft and conventions.

Dorn, Linda J. and Carla Soffos. Scaffolding Young Writers: A Writers’ Workshop Approach.
Excellent examples of student work and expectations for kindergarten through third grade. Information on setting up your workshop and photographs of classroom and bulletin boards.

Fletcher, Ralph and JoAnn Portalupi. Writing Workshop: The Essential Guide.
Easy to read and follow. Great comprehensive first book about writing workshop.

Extremely thorough and complete resource. Could be overwhelming to teachers new to writing workshop, but makes an excellent second reference book. Includes ideas for publishing, lists of trade books for different purposes, student work samples.

Thorough chapter on the writing process (cycle). Many examples of craft lessons and full-size forms you can photocopy.

Houston, Gloria. How Writing Works: Imposing Organizational Structure Within the Writing Process.

Lengthy and detailed with many examples of student work. Great for those who want to add depth to what they are doing. May be a bit overwhelming for the beginner.
